

Hillbilly Anarchist Skaters Descend on the Hot Springs Documentary Film Festival

Headlamp Pictures will screen “Skatopia: 88 Acres of Anarchy” at the 19th Hot Springs Documentary Film Festival on Saturday, October 25th in Hot Springs, Arkansas. The long awaited documentary takes viewers inside an infamous and extreme skateboarding scene in rural Appalachia.

Mad max demolition derbies, spontaneous car burnings and all-night skate sessions add to the “anything-goes” culture at Skatopia. A motley crew of traveling skaters and local hillbillies build new skate terrain, many of them living for months at Skatopia in shacks and broken down cars. Skatopia’s owner, Brewce Martin presides over the mayhem like a modern day Jim Jones. The movie follows him through an obstacle-strewn year in his struggle to make Skatopia a monument to skateboarding and to freedom.

The movie celebrates the freedom from everyday life that Skatopia offers, but it also takes a hard look at the flip side of Brewce’s energy and charisma. Brewce is no story book hero, but his fierce pursuit of his dream will inspire even those who never set foot on a skateboard. Brewce Martin says proudly about the film “It’s not an advertisement for Skatopia, they really show it like it is... the bad along with the good”.

The crew from Skatopia will join the filmmakers, the independent film world and Arkansas-area skaters for the movie screening and the after party. Director Laurie House says “We’re thrilled to be selected for the Hot Springs Documentary Fest, it’s a prestigious festival in an area with a great underground skate and film scene.”

The film will play in film festivals throughout early fall, followed by a theatrical premiere and a series of special screenings around the country. Television and DVD release in 2010.
